

Talking with your neighbors about your native garden

If your neighbors don't understand your native garden you can:

1. Share your personal "why."
2. Explain the impact

Hello, thanks for asking!
My garden looks different because it has native plants. Being and looking wild is a part of their nature! I love the bright colored flowers and the plants help the earth, which is important to me!

During the winter and fall the garden looks drier than usual but the roots are still taking in nutrients and the plants are habitat.

Native plants collect and clean water and attract and support important pollinators! All the different plants work together to create something wonderful, just like our community!

Imagine before the white picket fences and tidy grass lawns of the "American Dream."

Native plant gardens are a small way of returning to a way of relating to the earth where we can work with the earth rather than trying to control it.
